The rationale for increasing the program developer position from 21 to 35 hours is as follows. When this position was established in February, 1978, Title IX was essentially a part-time, small scale program at ECSC. The part-time nature of the program affected both the scope and type of activities carried out. The program developer's primary responsibilities were to collaborate with faculty on the modification of existing courses for Title IX students, develop courses for local agencies and implement one day workshops.

Since December of 1978, however, a full-time program coordinator has assumed administrative responsibility for the Title IX program. This will result in a significant change in program emphasis and activities. In turn, the program developer's responsibilities will be substantially increased.

The types of activities which will be carried out by Title IX during this fiscal year include curriculum development in concentration areas, specialized on-site training packages, and workshop series. These program areas are readily more detailed in scope and more substantive in content. It will necessitate that the program developer assume greater proposal writing and cost estimation skills, extensive community outreach and needs assessment on a regional as opposed to local basis, and responsibilities for assisting faculty in the formation of concentrated areas of study.

Program evaluation has been targeted as a priority by Title IX with regard to all activities conducted. The program developer will be requested to design and implement evaluation techniques.

In sum, the proposed work plan will require more program planning, greater liaison with faculty and community agencies and increased implementation tasks. For the above reasons, I believe it will be necessary to augment the number of hours that this position is employed.
